What do these test results mean?

Your test results are negative. This means that your tests did not find any sexually transmitted infections.

There is a chance that your results are not accurate if you tested too soon after a possible exposure to an STI. You may want to test again if you think you tested within the "window period".

Are my results accurate?

If you want to know if you have an STI after having sex, the length of time you wait before testing will affect how accurate the test is. Tests will always be negative in the days after having sex because it takes time for the test to detect whether an infection is present. The time to wait to get tested is different for different STIs (called the "window period"). Learn more...
